About Flinders University, Australia

Flinders University is one of Australia's leading providers of graduate programs in healthcare management, with many distinguished and successful graduates in Australia and the region. Flinders University was established in 1966 as South Australia's second university. It has a particularly strong faculty of Health Sciences with internationally recognised centres of excellence in research and teaching.

The Health Care Management programs are located within the College of Business, Government and Law at Flinders University. This creates many synergies and opportunities for collaboration in areas such as innovation, leadership, finance, economics and health law.

The Master of Health Administration is accredited by the Australasian College of Health Service Management (ACHSM), and is recognised as meeting the academic pre-requisites for people sitting Fellowship examinations with ACHSM or the Royal Australasian College of Medical Administrators (RACMA).

Staff involved in teaching are recruited on the basis of having had significant hands-on management experience in the health sector at a senior level. In addition, an industry advisory board with representatives from the public and private sector and major health professional bodies oversees the Master of Health Administration program. These factors ensure that the program has credibility and relevance for managers working in today's challenging health care environment.

Flinders Health Care Management has been delivering its Master of Health Administration program in Singapore since 2002 and in China, in association with Nankai University, since 2003.

Parkway College of Nursing and Allied Health is the education partner of Flinders University in Singapore.
